The Big Game is On—For All the Marbles

America is worse-off than its so-called allies. Our debt when considered in relationship to productivity as a nation is a sad joke. Other nations might have a worse debt to GDP ratios, but the extent of our debt/service makes for a more terrifying future prospect.

Making the situation worse, a not-so-soft coup has/is being played out in the US. There are calls from university heads to abolish the Constitution as a cause for our ills. Never specific, the calls are generalizations about a need to update old and in the way. Calls, sent-out as trial balloons, toes in the water testing, looking for acquiescence.

Two things are taking place at the same time: propagandized compliance—need to gain acceptance from peers is the name of the game. And once mass conformity is achieved, then decisive steps can be taken to strip-away our Bill of Rights protections.

But until sufficient conformity is attained, the coup progresses, 2 steps forward, 1 step back. By increment, power-distribution constitutional mandates shift away from citizens, states, to federal government—a phenomena mostly undiscerned by the many.

Example—war powers. Only Congress can declare war. The last war to be declared was WW2—but US-led wars never end. Under the auspices of administrations, non-declared wars (conducted hand-in-hand with arms manufactures), are now a constant.

These conflicts (often involving loss of life that exceeds declared wars), are done with the legislature handing-over its war-power mandate to various/sundry presidents. Because there is no constitutional mandate—this functions as a constitutional crime.

Congress has become a rubber-stamp uni-party, where wealth gatherers shift into corporate jobs—once their 'public service' ends. Consider what goes on in Congress. 50 Intelligence officers dismissed Hunter Biden's laptop as a Russian asset. Intel officers, like Fauci, who lied to Congress, were subject to arrest. Why didn't that happen?

The answer is simple: the coup of our government and consequent conformity among citizens has reached a level at which there is not the will in the legislature/citizens to carry out constitutional mandates. It's gotten so bad that many of us are left hoping that the likes of a nationalist, Trump, can be of some help in saving the republic.

It's said that the game of life is played-out on a 5 inch course—the space between the ears. Some days, barraged with input I can't possibly assimilate, and overwhelmed, I doubt that America will prevail against the elite mission. To what mission do I refer?

Begin with citizens around the globe summarily charged/sentenced for disseminating misinformation—contrary to the elite narrative. Did the elite learn from January 6th—that they can throw citizens in prison for years without charges, for taking a Congressional stroll? Are they betting not enough Americans will stand up to them? 2 months before an election, will they do whatever it takes to instill fear into our hearts/minds?

It's not by coincidence that reporters are harassed/jailed globally, at airports, held without charges, then released after 24 hours of interrogation. Elites are sending a message: the worst crime to commit is to question the warmongering narrative. That's certainly the case in Palestine where 126 reporters (3/4s of reporters killed globally in 2023), have been killed). Makes a body think maybe it's being done on purpose?

Some of my colleagues are not at all convinced there will be a November election (I think Bill Holter has adjusted-down his odds of an election). Given the possibility that we do have an election, between now and then an iron elite fist will come down hard.

The whole thing is rigged. In my opinion, January 6th was made such a big deal to cover for intelligence agencies/social networks, in an outright theft of the 2020 election. Maybe if elites make a big enough stink, we get distracted—look away from real crime.

There's new factors at work now. Biden would have lost, but maybe Kamala can beat Trump—if she can stay away from answering questions (keep in mind that republicans are easily hoodwinked—and there's likely a grand strategy to rig any debate).

But what if it becomes apparent Kamala will lose? The groundwork for that is being laid by an insider, left spokesperson, Jake Sullivan, recently vacationing in Beijing—where he got an unlikely audience with Xi Jinping. What was it Jake was doing there?

How about testing the waters to see if China would stay out of it if NATO goes for broke/attacks Russia? Were there a China poll as to who the Chinese distrust most, the US would win—hands-down. China knows: when Russia goes down, they're next.

I'm assuming most of us saw a beaming Chinese defense minister letting Sullivan know, in no uncertain terms, that Taiwan is part of China—always—now—and forever. He was reminding us that we recognized Taiwan as China—we best not arm Taiwan.

There are 2 things—each of which could directly decide the election—the economy and Ukraine. Some see the left letting Trump win so he can be blamed for economic collapse. That's not credible. Dollar collapse has been anticipated/put-off for decades.

Dollar collapse is overdue and placing blame on Trump as responsible would be difficult. Bidenomics failed and Americans felt they were better-off with Trump (a perception bolstered by almost $9T in unproductive dollar creation during Trump's 1st term).

Some say it doesn't matter who wins. Ultimately, maybe, but what we have now is Groucho Marx's, game show, You Bet Your Life—with stakes far beyond doomsday clock highs, and no indication that either Kamala or her pack of fools even see it. You know why? They don't care about our fears—they're better than us. They just smirk.

The rule of law in the 9 eyes (5 eyes: US, CA, AUS, GB, NZ, along w/DK, FR, NL, NORW), has been cancelled. I get emails from global readers, accounts (unreported in the US), of persons questioned charged, jailed, killed for using free speech to question elite narratives. In Britain, the new PM, Keir Starmer, just a few weeks in office, sees himself as satan's emissary, jailing British subjects in support of illegal migrant policy.

The Bill of Rights offers us some protection, for now, but the last battle for the fate of the 1st Amendment is to be fought on US soil—all up and down the block. It's game on.
